

'While We Talk You Do' Says Famed Northwestern Educator

"Torrance schools are doing what we only talk about," claimed Dr. Clyde Kohn, professor of education at Northwestern University, during a recent tour of the local school system.

He lauded the outdoor auditorium at the new Seaside School as a product of an "engineering genius."

The professor conferred with a number of the system's geography and social studies teachers while on his brief visit here. He recommended that large wall maps be dispensed with in favor of road maps depicting the local geography and the use of globes for world geography study for students of the lower grades. He contended that the elementary grade students cannot comprehend the complexities of Mercator Projections and other map making methods and that they only confuse the youngsters and tend to make the study of geography a chore instead of pleasure.
